Going to Bat for Agriculture

Steve and Bonnie Wenger with children Brad (17), Brandon (14) and Nicholas (8)

Steve and Bonnie Wenger of Lebanon County have been helping Farm Bureau "go to bat" for agriculture since they were young farmers, raising a family and starting to build their farm operation which includes turkeys, dairy livestock and 1,400 acres of cropland.

Steve has been a Farm Bureau leader at the county, state and national level. Serving on his county's legislative committee, Steve played a first-hand role in Farm Bureau's "going to bat" for farmers over illegal restrictive local ordinances. "Although it wasn't a problem here, I thought what Farm Bureau did in supporting agriculture was good," he said. After several years of hard work, legislation allowing farmers to request a review of troublesome ordinances by the state Attorney General was enacted last year.

Wenger feels he's received as much as he's given to Farm Bureau. "What I really like about Farm Bureau is that it gives you confidence to work with your legislators," he said.

For Bonnie Wenger it's Farm Bureau's activities to tell the farmer's story to the public, such as the Mobile Ag Education Science Lab, that most excite her. She has helped bring the Ag Lab, which uses science experiments to teach elementary students about agriculture, to her school district. "Farm Bureau has taught me to believe that one person can make a difference, and that every voice counts," she said.

As a grass-roots organization, Farm Bureau depends on members like Bonnie and Steve Wenger to keep it "going to bat" to solve the problems confronting agriculture.
